Monthly Commentary

The S&P was up 3.6% and the Eurostoxx up 0.6%.

In terms of sectors in US and in Europe, resources and defensive sectors were the best; financials and consumer discretionary the worst.

Our Barometer is indicating a slowdown ahead. The strong parts of the Barometer are all related to commodities and energy and as such difficult to interpret in the middle of the Ukrainian war.

March 2022

Fed officials have communicated they will be aggressive in raising rates and the market is now expecting rates to rise the most over the next 9 months since 1994.

Source: Bloomberg

The Fed is reacting to an employment market that has become “tight to an unhealthy level”.

The probability of ending up in a recession in US is very high as the Fed has never been able to engineer a “soft landing” starting from such a low level of unemployment.

Even before thinking of a future recession, the Fed tightening rates in a slowdown is what caused a number of stock market slumps (2015-16 and 2018 for example); as such, driven by our systems, we do not believe that the stock markets internals can be strong into the first few interest rate rises.

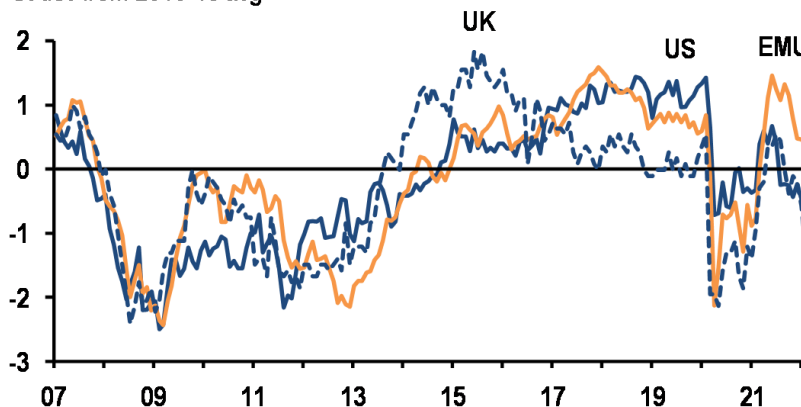

Another very important channel that could contribute to a slow down in US is the housing market; the recent increase in long term rates has an immediate impact on the increase of mortgage rates that has dramatically reduced housing affordability.

Europe is entangled in a totally different type of problem as the war in Ukraine is challenging from a humanitarian point of view, from a huge increase in energy costs and also the supply/availability of energy, specially gas.

Inflation has increased very substantially, and by 1.8% in the last month alone, which has had an immediate impact on consumer confidence

Our systems have worked well in the very challenging conditions of the last two months.

Our work is proceeding at great speed to improve the tools available to manage the fund and to improve our process.

The major challenge we are facing is around the uncertainty of energy prices caused by the Ukrainian war, given their importance for earnings growth.
