Monthly Commentary

The S&P was up 7%, the Eurostoxx up 2.9%.

In Europe best sectors were Travel and Leisure and Autos; the worst Utilities and Healthcare.

The present macro situation seems very confusing and I don't remember seeing such divergent views from people I respect.

On one side an important indicator that looks at orders and inventories in the main regions of the world is flashing bullish mainly because inventories have fallen to very low levels; this would indicate the beginning of a new phase of recovery.

On the other side a very high level of orders and a number of indicators that are rolling over from very high levels would be indicative of a peak and of an economy that should start to slow.

US - Economic Surprise index

Source: Citigroup, Bloomberg.

The advantage of the approach that we are building is that the fund manager doesn't need to take a "view"; the shape of the book is dictated by market price movements and their interactions with companies' fundamentals.

Investors' positioning has become pretty bullish but is not extreme yet.

Importantly, in its recently concluded monetary framework review the Fed announced moving from flexible inflation targeting to average inflation targeting. This implies that the Fed would allow for an overshoot of its 2% inflation objective.

This is in line with a policy that intends to create negative real interest rates which is one of the few ways to reduce the huge amount of debt accumulated over the last few years.

Plus500 reported very good numbers (many of them preannounced at the beginning of July), restarted the buy back and is giving some indications of better governance.

The exceptionally good operating performance of the company is discrediting the bears of the business who thought that mid-2018 was the peak because of new regulation being implemented and high cryptocurrencies trading that had positively affected the business. The stock has been strong this year but to be fair back in 2018 I would have expected the stock price to be a lot higher by now.
